Modern-Day Good Samaritans

The following was recently posted on Facebook by Mikayla May. Mikayla is the granddaughter of David & LaDonna May and currently attends Vanderbilt.

Because the Vanderbilt hospitals are right smack in the middle of campus, I cut through a side street between the Vanderbilt Hospital and Children’s Hospital to get to class each day. Because of this, I’m often walking with a mix of students, professional and important-looking people, and people trying to get to their appointments or visiting one of the hospitals.

This morning it was raining and chilly, so I put on my rain boots, rain jacket, and got out my umbrella. I was walking down the street behind an important-looking man carrying a briefcase and wearing a blazer, who was also carrying an umbrella. Across the street there was a mom wearing a light jacket pushing her child in an uncovered stroller huddled under an overhang waiting for the rain to die down. The man saw them about the same time I did and immediately crossed the street to them, handing them his very expensive-looking umbrella. Then he put his briefcase over his head like a cover and began walking again.

Talk about convicting. I was reminded of the story of the good Samaritan. How many good people, “godly” people, walked right by an injured man on the side of the road without giving him a second thought? My stomach sank as I realized that was me this morning. I was not a good Samaritan. I was over prepared for the rain, yet when I saw people in need I continued walking. The businessman served people well today. He served like Jesus. He showed love and grace to some people who needed it, as I continued to walk by.

Today, I will start serving people well. Maybe I will start carrying some extra umbrellas in my backpack to help some people in need. Or maybe serving looks more like giving my only one away. Who knows? But I’m going to start praying for some opportunities to serve others well and I hope you’ll join me.
